of collectors. Thirty years ago, they were proud speak a language that no one else was speaking: the language of the art world. If you were part of this world, you were the intellectual elite. Step by step, the new generation has proven to be very smart and it's hard to judge them.

what role does an art gallery play in society?

E.P: I'm not personally involved in politics, maybe one day I will be. A lot of the artists I represent are. Ericson and Ziegler, is an American duo of artists who were very engaged in politics and social issues. Claude Rutault, a conceptual artist who, through his writing practice opens the minds to societal problems. Sophie Callie is an important figure in feminism. Bharti Kher discusses the condition of women in India through her work. Paola Pivi, although recently changed her mind, was associated with the Free Tibet Movement.

what is the effect of artists sharing their work on social media?

E.P: Artists in the 20th century were making so many pieces from the same series. It happened naturally and not for the sake of the market. Nowadays, the work of artists who are in Social Media is exposed to millions of people around the world. They're subject to a pressure that earlier artists didn't have.

will new technologies take over gallery spaces?

E.P: I might be wrong but the nature of what we show and sell is physical, so I hope in the future people will still want to experience the works in person. Technologies can exist and develop in parallel, but I don't think it will replace the physical experience. Movie theatres still exist despite the growth of video streaming.

what's been your most recent success?

E.P: Receiving the Medal "Ordre des Arts et des Lettres" from the government of France and the opening of my gallery in Shanghai. It's also a big accomplishment to experience how a number of artists I've been working with for decades, are becoming successful worldwide and breaking records. When you have two or three very successful artists, you think it's a coincidence; when this list is long and keeps on growing, you know you've had an influence on them.

what initiatives can galleries start to make fine art more accessible to young collectors?

E.P: Having pieces at all price points. At Perrotin's shops, we have books, posters, postcards, prints, and limited edition products. Artworks are expensive, but clearly, the difference between our business and other entertainment businesses is that anyone can visit our gallery free and live the experience.

what are your favorite pieces of art from your collection?

E.P: Artworks are like your babies, it's hard to choose one over the other. Also, I don't have a personal collection, my gallery owns everything. I'm proud of the works I have and I didn't even sell them even when I was going through financial problems. I have a Murakami from a very long time ago, a piece by Pierre Soulages, a bear by Paola Pivi [image above]. I'm not pretending like some dealers do, that I have a personal collection. There's a difference between inventory and collection.

what's your proudest accomplishment?

E.P: The fact that most of my artists stay with me; they're the reason to make me want to make the gallery better every day.

what is your biggest regret?

E.P: One of my regrets is being too generous with some collectors. I gave them access to all the best
